

Forgiveness can perhaps claim to be the central Christian virtue. Yet it may be the most difficult response to consider in the aftermath of a significant unjust injury. How does the current research on the psychology of interpersonal forgiveness interact with a theological understanding of forgiving so that the result is truly “overcoming evil with good?”